The Terrible Fate of a Daring Indian.

Plunged Into a Maelstrom Carried Under-Ground Nearly Two Hundred and Fifty

One of the most remarkable subterranean waterways in the world was recently discovered in the nothern ranges of the Rocky Mountains in Montana. An accident, which proved fatal to life, was the agency by which the discovery was made.

tively Phil Barnes and Piere Leger, a Flathead Indian guide named Klikat and myself left Bonner's Ferry on the 7th day of August, und struck out in a northeasternly direction, headed for the peaks and canyous in the 5.000 Fall and Winter extreme northern range of the main divide of the Rockies. The purpose of my two white companions was to prospect for valuable minerals in a section of the country which few, if ping, pushing and pulling our packmules through the almost boundless wilderness of undergrowth, timber, gloomy canyons, craggy peaks and drifts of snow, we found ourselves. on the 28th day of August-according to the observations taken by me-within twenty-five or thirty miles of the Canadian line and at an altitude of 7,500 teet. The nights were extremely cold and the peaks that towered above our heads to the eastward were covered with snow, while the days were unpleasantly, almost scorchingly hot between 10 o'clock in the torenoon and 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

It was noon of the day mentioned above. We had come to a standstill, unable to advance owing to the great perpendicular cliffs in front of us and to the right. On our left was a craggy precipice about 40 feet high, overhanging a roaring stream and extending fully two miles to the South. Beyoud the torrent and its rocky-bed was a still higher precipice. We could hear the noisy stream as it ran trantically down the steeps from the melting snow on the distant peaks. But we could hear still more than the swash of the running stream. As we stood there looking vainly around for some opening by which we might advance there came to our ears a deep, roaring sound, alternating in force, stronger and weaker at intervals of a few seconds. It came in jarring sounds, with a volume like thunder. For some minutes we listened in silence. Then Klikat spoke:

out the devils camp fire."

"Big bole in the water," I echoed. What do you mean by that, Kli-

"You come look." he said, advancing to the edge of the precipice and throwing himself flat on the rock, with his head and shoulders banging over. "Ugh!" he exclaimed, "Big-Hole-in-the-Water heap mad to-day. Him funny. Water go in ground; never come out."

Following Kliklat's example, I cautiously approached the edge of the and was silent. But it was short saprojecting rock, threw myself on the tiety. It quickly opened its dark and ground, face downward, and peered down from its dizzy height, Barnes before, and gave out a snore that and Leger did likewise.

I rather thought it would, but at that moment my attention was suddenly and shockingly attracted to Klikat, who had been lying about 8 feet away on my left. There was a low, grumbling sound, and then a mass of shelving rock right under Klikat broke loose and fell with a fearful crash into the edge of the whirling pool. I started to my feel just as I saw the Indian making frantic efforts to cling to the edge of the cliff. But his hold was too slight and the rock dian. crumb'ed under his grasp. Without uttering word or sound of any kind, Klikat fell headlong into the mad water beneath.

Attera tew seconds he came to the surface. Barnes rushed to one of the pack-mules for a rope, but it was too late. Three, four, five times did Klikat swim around in a spiral course that gradually drew nearer the center of the great funnel, at the same time making frantic efforts to swim out of it. But it was labor lost. With a movement that looked like a sudden twist he shot into the very center of the vortex. For one brief moment he spun around like a top, and thendown he went with the pillar of foam, out of sight into the bowels of the earth and the darkness of death. For some seconds it seemd as if the great ravenous tunnel had been satiated. The cavity filled with water unfathomable depths again as wide as made the very mountains trembler. Cautiously we three withdrew from Leger at once called us to him, and together we dragged the body ashore. The face of the dead was badly bruis, juvenile feelings were again revived ed and torn and utterly disfigured. The body was very much bloated, too, and all we could see for a certainty was that the corpse was the remains of an Indian.

"Hold on!" suddenly exclaimed Barnes, as he bent over the dead body and cut some thing from the neck-a piece of ragged clotn, "By ---!" he cried, as he raised himself erect and held up the article mentioned. "This is the remnant of my silk handkers chief which I gave to poor Klikat to cover the gash he cut on his neck by that dead limb one day-do you remember? And see! Court Neckties.

There are neckties galore. They exist in many shapes and all colors. Different kind of ties, it seems, are worn by different race of humanity. The negro, for instance, generally appear in a flowery red article that shines afar. This is good taste, however, for red makes a striking contrast with black. The redder the tie and the blacker the negro, the more pleasing the effect. A more beautiful sight cannot be seen, than that of the colored gentleman attired in tight fitting uneven tannables to show off more decidedly the size and symmetry of his No. 12 Congress gatter, adorned with a vermillion hued necktie all over his breast, and a large sunflower as his button-hole boquet. We wish, however, to make special mention of the Court Necktie. The court tie is principally worn by a species of biped, named lawyer. It consists of a large strip of black silk about one inch wide, and is intended to be tied around the collar in a bow. The proper place for the bow to apof the legal fraternity under the ear or the back of the neck. Occasionally it climbs on top of the collar and instead of having a horozontal position, assumes a perpendicular one, or else is turned up side down and wrong side out.
